Inauguration Day 2017 brings with it nationwide anti-Trump protests, a dimension to this news story that a local Southern news station would prefer to avoid. Fortunately, they are presented with the perfect opportunity to sidestep it all, and at the same time show their viewers they're about telling the kind of news Trump himself might like to see.

It's Inauguration Day 2017, excitement is in the air, and KKSH TV is pleased to bring its viewers today's other big news story, especially if you don't like watching all those stupid protests (giggles): It's all going down at the museum out in Bo Jim near Pinewood off Route 23, where they're featuring that special exhibit going on now through April, "Abstract Paintings Inspired By Donald Trump Twitters". It seems that one abstract painting in particular is attracting a line around the museum building – people from all over want to get married in front of this abstract painting! We are referring to the one inspired by the Trump twitter, "Somebody asked me this, my answer is no, I don't happen to care much for Elizabeth Warren's chest. But I'm looking forward to meeting Kim Jong Un's new girlfriend. Wow. I mean that sincerely."

The news anchors and on the scene news team are as excited as can be, finding great angles, chatting with the priest performing the marriage ceremonies in front of the painting, talking to the people on line to get married, many of whom express an artistic perspective on this abstract painting, while others really like the twitter message, plus a young couple doing this as their way of remembering the Korean War. Then there's the old couple who come to the museum for several hours every day to look at a different abstract painting, this one inspired by the Trump twitter, "I thought of growing a mustache, but Melania said it would tickle too much down there, so I wanna please my woman, she shaves, I shave, whadya gonna do?" When asked, the couple express how they just really like the artist's use of color, that's all.
